BOSTON SYMPHONY

ORCHESTRA PLEASES

Exceptionally Fine Rendering

of Beethoven's

Music.

The first visit of the Boston Symphon Orchestra in a musical season might properiy be accorded the rank of an event. It is certain that in the estimation of this public it stands second to nothing, exopera, which, however, presents a dis tinctly marked difference. The concerts of the Bostonian performers do not stir the depths of society. While they are not ignored by those society people who are fervent lovers of good music in all its manifestations, they appeal rather to that body of serious devotees of the tonal art which concerns itself more with analysis and reflection than with other

The audience which assembled last evening in Carnegie Hall at the first conevening in Carnegie Hall at the first con-cert of the current season was large and numbered many who are well known in the activities of the town. The recep-tion bestowed upon Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, when he walked upon the stage, was long and hearty, but the ap-plause which followed some of the music betokened feelings which not even the re-appearance of a favorite director could arouse.

Programme Rich in Opportunities The programme consisted of Bee seventh symphony, the "Tragic overture of Brahms, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes" and the overture to Wagners "Flying Dutchman." It was not a perfectly symmetrical arrangement, but it served its purpose in furnishing oppor-tunities for the display of the finest quali-ties of the admired orchestra.

The symphony in A is a delightful num-ber with which to begin a season's offer-ings. Familiar as it is to all music lovers it can never be wearlsome, even when played but indifferently. When given as it was last night it satisfies every artistic demand, filling the ear with loveliest melody, with captivating rhythms, with fastidiously colored instrumentation and the spirit with poetic imagery.

Dr. Muck elected to make haste slowly in most of his tempi, but he kept in mind the guiding theme, "Without haste, with-out rest." There was no labored effort to set forth a new reading, no search after hitherto hidden messages in the middle voices of the harmony, no emphatic treatment of dynamic nuances or time modiincations. Yet from beginning to end all the voices of the great orchestra sang eloquently, with unsurpassable beauty of tone, with exquisite balance, with delicately finished phrasing, with a marvellous range of sound, rising from the whisper of a perfect pianissimo to the full throated proclamation of fortissimo which had power without violence.

Elegantly Polished Delivery.

A more elegantly polished delivery of the music it would be difficult to conceive, yet there was never wanting the note of Brethaven's wirility. The highest the proclamation of the great proclamation of the first process of the music it would be difficult to conceive, yet there was never wanting the note of Brethaven's wirility.
